内容简介

This book documents the changes going on in the field of industrial architecture, due in part to the large-scale proliferation of industrial complexes that seem to spring up without much care of planning entrepreneurs, architects and public institutions are increasingly structures for the ways of conceiving office buildings and industrial structures for the immediate future, with an increased consciousness of the imprint these buildings make on the landscape, together with the growing demand for sustainable environments, architects are increasingly creating spaces that are progressively worker-friendly and respectful towards their surroundings.
